

Business Is Liquid

Profit made is to be used to analyze the current data and make predictions on what will generate future profit, if desired.

Business is not an obligation, it is a voluntary, at-will activity.

Subsidies from governmental institutions that are not emergency funds to assist in the production of what are deemed to be essential goods and/or services are anti-capitalist uses of tax base.

Business is liquid, hence it not an immovable, stagnant miasma.

(The term 'miasma' as used in this instance is referring to an outdated belief that disease was caused by inhaling odors resultant from putrefying corpses. As we know now, it is more specifically microscopic contaminants present in what is respiration. It occurred to me after I suggested the metaphor that 'miasma' could be interpreted as a poisonous, humid area of noxious, but still liquid particles. The author's intention here is to enhance the communicative properties inherent in written language by evoking a memory creation path involving multiple senses and openings to mental routes where additional, previously established information by the user may then be amalgamated.)

Constant growth of a business is not a measure of its success. It is a measure of the failure of its victims. Innovation is what drives life and evolution. New ideas demand changes, not slight improvements to efficiency.

A successful business is one that fills a need, not creates one. Clinging to one idea while impeding progress towards another is detrimental to society.
